Review: Technocracy: The Hard Road to World Order, by

Patrick M. Wood,

The "New World Order" will not be a republic, a monarchy, or a democracy. It will not be communist or capitalist. Instead, according to Patrick M. Wood's phenomenal book, it will be a "technocracy" — a system that eliminates individual liberty under the pretext of environmentalism and economic efficiency, ruled by elitist technocrats. But the fight is not over, and resistance is not futile, Wood says.

The technocratic "world order" will look like a great 'booming, buzzing confusion,' but an end-run around national sovereignty, eroding it piece by piece, will accomplish much more than the old-fashioned frontal assault," explained former U.S. State Department bigwig Richard Gardner in a 1974 issue of Foreign Affairs, the flagship mouthpiece of the globalist Council on Foreign Relations. The article was headlined "The Hard Road to World Order."

Wood, perhaps alone among leaders in the liberty movement, methodically sorts through the "booming, buzzing confusion" to reveal the emerging global economic and political system known as "Technocracy."

Wood is an expert on the Trilateral Commission, having written the explosive book Trilaterals Over Washington with the late scholar Antony Sutton. Gardner, the advocate of an "end-run" around self-government, was one of the original Trilaterals.

Founded by David Rockefeller and Zbigniew Brzezinski in 1973, this Deep State cabal was dedicated to creating what it described as a "New International Economic Order." Brzezinski laid out much of the vision in his 1970 book, Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technetronic Era.

In 2015 CFR member Dr. Parag Khanna followed up with Technocracy in America, which calls for abolishing the Senate, replacing the presidency with an executive committee, and allowing the Supreme Court to "modernize" the U.S. Constitution to make possible technocratic rule by totalitarian "experts."

The term technocracy first came to prominence in 1932 when Nicholas Murray Butler, the president of Columbia University — already a bastion of communists, collectivists, totalitarians, and kooks — announced that the institution was supporting a new form of economic organization to be guided and controlled by scientists and engineers. The name for this proposed system was "technocracy."

After a giant scandal, recounted in the book, the effort failed. But the technocrats did not give up. A magazine called The Technocrat defined the system: "Technocracy is the science of social engineering, the scientific operation of the entire social mechanism to produce and distribute goods and services to the entire population." Under the plan, private property, money, and prices arrived at through market forces of supply and demand would give way to a new system in which energy and resources would become the key accounting units throughout the economy. Individuals would become nothing but cogs in the machine.

Obviously, such a system is completely incompatible with individual liberty, Judeo-Christian civilization, or free agency. Yet, as Wood documents, it is the system being advanced by the United Nations, governments around the world, and legions of useful (tax-funded) idiots. Under the guise of "sustainable development," saving the environment, and reducing inequality, naive people have been suckered in. "Sustainability," the underlying pretext behind the international agreements known as UN Agenda 21 and UN Agenda 2030, is basically warmed-over technocracy, the book shows.

In UN Agenda 2030, adopted by Obama and all other governments in 2015, the UN pledges that it will protect the planet through "sustainable consumption and production" and by "sustainably managing its natural resources." This must include "sustainable" control of every single inch of the planet's surface. As Wood puts it, the initial cost of this utopia is "nothing less than turning control over all natural resources to the UN."

The global-warming hypothesis is serving as an important justification for the advancement of this ideology. Then-UN Framework Convention on Climate Change boss Christiana Figueres let the cat out of the bag in 2015. "This is probably the most difficult task we have ever given ourselves, which is to intentionally transform the economic development model, for the first time in human history," she declared, adding that the goal was to "change the economic model that has been reigning for at least 150 years."

Other important components of the march toward technocracy include "public-private partnerships", "regional government" and "councils of governments", and "Fintech," a new financial system in which private capital can be "redeployed" to finance the goals of the technocrats and their "world order." A "cashless society" is a key part of the plan.

Wood makes a compelling case that China is the leading model of the coming technocratic dictatorship, by using its "social credit" system to rank every single person. The score is based on everything from creditworthiness, religious and political views to associations with other people. A person's score determines whether he or she may borrow money, fly on an airplane, get an education, leave the country - without having to resort to torture, terror, prisons, and executions very often. As Wood shows, similar schemes are already being tried in America, involving government surveillance within "Smart Cities," Big Data captured by Big Tech social-media companies, and much more. Eventually, the technocratic social-credit system is intended to be global in scope.

In a chapter headlined "Worshipping the Creation," Wood exposes the spiritual component. "In sum, Technocracy subsumes Scientism as a religion where technocrats represent the priesthood that worships the god of Science and Technology," warns Wood, who quotes Psalms 106:36 to make the point that serving idols will only end up being a snare to those involved in idolatry.

Wood advises people on how to resist. Calling resistance to evil and evil-doers a "moral imperative," he urges readers to get involved at the local level. Citing Sun Tzu's Art of War, Wood calls on readers to make sure they know their enemy and themselves. He also offers ideas on how to avoid surveillance by Big Tech and other instruments of technocracy such as Facebook, Google, and Twitter. Despite some quibbles the book connects a number of important dots and programs in an easy-to-read, enjoyable format. It should be considered essential reading for all freedom fighters.

Arizona Leads in the Smart Region Space With the Founding of the 'Connective'

During the ASU Smart Region Summit in November, the formation of the statewide collaborative, The Connective was announced. Through a community-driven applied research model and intentional, unprecedented collaboration, the consortium of public, private, university, and community partners will empower Greater Phoenix communities to build the nation's largest, most connected smart region.

Several companies have announced partnerships with The Connective, including Cox, Dell, Sprint, and SRP. The Cox Connected Environments Collaboratory at ASU will develop Internet of Things (IoT) solutions to problems facing the optimization of buildings for sustainability, providing new learning experiences in virtual and augmented reality, infrastructure modeling, privacy and security, sustainability, and more.

Bill Gates, Microsoft's co-founder, had invested in the purchase of 25,000 acres west of the White Tank Mountains for a planned new smart city known as Belmont, and has now also invested in another 2,800 acres in Buckeye.

Belmont's partners consider the greenfield community to be a "blank slate of opportunity" for developing advanced communication, energy, and transportation infrastructure designed for innovation and delivering an improved quality of life.

Leader of 'The Base' militant group revealed as intelligence contractor, suspected federal agent

The Guardian has learned the true identity of the leader and founder of the US-based neo-Nazi terror network the Base, after an FBI investigation uncovered their plans to start a race war.

Members of the group stand accused of federal hate crimes, murder plots and firearms offenses.

The Base's leader has operated under the aliases "Norman Spear" and "Roman Wolf". Members of the network do not know his true identity due to the group's culture of secrecy.

But the Guardian can reveal that "Norman Spear" is in fact US-born Villanova U.-educated Rinaldo Nazzaro, 46, who has a long history of advertising his services as an intelligence, military and security contractor.

The Base - which is an approximate English translation of "al-Qaida" - began recruiting in 2018. The white supremacy group extols the virtues of an all-out race war.

Using encrypted apps, members of the highly organized group planned terror campaigns and vandalized synagogues.

The US attorney for Maryland, Robert K Hur, speaking after the recent arrest of three members of the Base, said that they "took steps to act and act violently on their racist views".

Rinaldo Nazzaro has maintained a decidedly low profile: he has no visible presence on any major social media platforms, no published writings under his own name, and no profile in local or national media.

The Guardian was able to unravel Nazzaro's identity due to his 2018 activities in the Pacific north-west.

Last August, an Oregon-based antifascist group, Eugene Antifa, warned that the Base was planning a "hate camp" in the neighboring state of Washington, and claimed Nazzaro (operating under the alias of "Spear") had purchased land in Stevens county for training purposes.

Local media outlets picked up the story, which led local law enforcement to contact the FBI and the Southern Law Poverty Center.

Stevens county Sheriff, Brad Manke learned that 'The Base' in Dec. 2018 purchased 30 acres in Ferry County, WA which is a neighboring county.

Tax affidavits gave the address of a family member of Nazzaro in NJ.

The remote location of the land is consistent with "Norman Spear's" advocacy of a white supremacist strategy called the Northwest Territorial Imperative (NTI), a separate ethnostate as promoted by the deceased Harold Covington.

"Spear" filmed a series of short instructional presentations on the tactics and strategy of guerrilla warfare in which he is identified as "Defense Studies expert and former CIA field intelligence officer Norman Spear".

This detail, coupled with other leads, compelled many to speculate whether "Norman Spear" was, in fact, a federal agent since from 2009 and 2019 Nazzaro billed himself as an intelligence expert working with various government and military agencies.

Materials and sources consulted by the Guardian indicate that Nazzaro, as "Spear", has faced persistent suspicions from current and former members of the group that he is a "fed", or the agent of a foreign government, or that the Base is a "honeypot" intended to lure neo-Nazis out into the open for the benefit of law enforcement agencies.

Meanwhile, "Norman Spear" appears to have had no extended history in the neo-Nazi movement before emerging as leader of the Base.

The only people within the movement who vouched for "Spear" were connected to the Northwest Front (NWF) whose founder, Harold Covington, was himself the subject of persistent rumors within the white nationalist movement that he was a federal informant, and that NWF was itself a honeypot.

"Norman Spear" has told Base members that he remains in Russia, where he is believed by some law enforcement agencies to be working for the Russian government.

The Guardian's investigation of the group continues.

'Totalitarian': House climate chair slammed for urging Google to squelch 'climate misinformation'

Rep. Kathy Castor (D-FL), chair of the House Select Committee on the Climate Crisis, asked Google on Monday to remove "climate disinformation videos" from YouTube's "recommendation algorithm," demonetize videos that promote "harmful misinformation," and correct the record for those exposed to "climate denial and climate misinformation."

In her letter to Google CEO Sundar Pichai, Ms. Castor cited a Jan. 16 report by the progressive climate activism group Avaaz.

The report cited PragerU videos featuring MIT atmospheric physics professor emeritus Richard Lindzen and former UVA research professor Patrick Michaels, as well as a 2018 interview with Mr. Michaels, who holds a Ph.D. in ecological climatology, on Fox's "Life, Liberty & Levin."

"Obviously, the MIT professor of atmospheric physics should not be allowed to run amok on Youtube. People might learn something," cracked Australian climate blogger Joanne Nova.

In her letter, Ms. Castor noted that YouTube last year used its policy against "dangerous and harmful" content to remove economic incentives for channels promoting anti-vaccination views.

Steve Milloy (@JunkScience) tweeted, "I can only imagine what her side would do to us if they had real power."

Rep Jones introduces bill to keep SC Guard home from undeclared wars

A bipartisan group of Afghanistan and Iraq war era veterans praised State Rep. Stewart Jones (SC-14) on Monday for introducing legislation requiring that South Carolina's National Guard units cannot be deployed for foreign combat or combat support duties unless Congress has formally adopted a declaration of war as provided by the U.S. Constitution."

As veterans, we strongly support the U.S. taking strong military action when necessary to defend American lives and interests," said former Idaho Army NG Sgt. Dan McKnight, founder of BringOurTroopsHome.US, who served 18 months in Afghanistan. "We thank Rep. Jones for acting to ensure that when South Carolina's men and women in uniform are involved, it's done the right way, the way the Constitution provides.

McKnight said Jones' legislation is based on what's been dubbed "Defend the Guard" legislation, first introduced last year in West Virginia by state Del. Pat McGeehan, a graduate of the U.S.A.F. Academy who served as an intelligence officer in Afghanistan.

Nothing in HB 4728 would prevent the governor from mobilizing the National Guard to respond to a natural disaster or maintain civil order.

McKnight's group in November organized a bipartisan conference in Washington, D.C., of lawmakers who plan to introduce the same bill in multiple state legislatures this year, hoping to exercise the powers of state governments under the 10th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution to check and balance the power of the federal government to use state-based National Guard troops for long-term combat deployments. --

QAnon conspiracy theory creeps into mainstream politics

MILWAUKEE -- At a Trump rally in Milwaukee [two middle age couples] bonded over their interest in QAnon, which centers on the baseless belief that Trump is waging a secret campaign against enemies in the "deep state" and a child sex trafficking ring run by satanic pedophiles and cannibals.

What started as an online obsession for the far-right fringe has grown beyond its origins in a dark corner of the internet. QAnon has been creeping into the mainstream political arena for more than a year. The trend shows no sign of abating as Trump attracts a loyal audience of conspiracy theorists and other fringe groups to his raucous rallies.

Trump has retweeted QAnon-promoting accounts. Followers flock to Trump's rallies wearing clothes and hats with QAnon symbols and slogans. At least 23 current or former congressional candidates in the 2020 election cycle have endorsed or promoted QAnon, according to the liberal watchdog Media Matters for America.

Conspiracy theorists aren't the only fringe characters drawn to Trump rallies. The Oath Keepers, an anti-government group formed in 2009 after President Barack Obama's election, has been sending "security volunteers" to escort Trump supporters at rallies across the country.

University of California, Davis history professor Kathryn Olmsted, author of a book called "Real Enemies: Conspiracy Theories and American Democracy, World War I to 9/11," said that Trump's conspiracy-minded rhetoric seems to fire up part of his base. "Finally, there is someone saying they're not crazy."

Conspiracy theories are nothing new, but experts fear the powerful engine of social media and a volatile political climate have ramped up the threat of violence. An FBI bulletin in May warned that conspiracy theory-driven extremists have become a domestic terrorism threat. The bulletin specifically mentions QAnon.

Asked about QAnon in 2018, then-White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said Trump "condemns and denounces any group that would incite violence against another individual." Some major Trump supporters, including former White House aide Sebastian Gorka, have denounced QAnon.

For more than two years, followers have pored over a tangled set of clues purportedly posted online by a high-ranking government official known only as "Q." A core belief is that deep state operatives and top Democrats, including Hillary Clinton and Obama, will be sent to Guantanamo Bay during an event called "The Storm."

The first Q "drop" appeared on the 4chan imageboard in October 2017. The messages migrated to 8chan until a string of mass shootings by gunmen who posted manifestos on the site led to it getting forced offline in August. The imageboard relaunched in November under the new name 8kun.

"People in the QAnon community feel like they are banding together to uncover the real truth behind the scenes," said Travis View, who uses a pseudonym to protect himself. His acerbic comments about what he calls an "apocalyptic political cult" have earned him more than 20,000 followers on Twitter and vitriol from QAnon believers.

At the Milwaukee rally some wore apparel adorned with a "Q" or "WWG1WGA," which stands for the QAnon slogan, "Where we go one, we go all."

The May 30 bulletin sent by the FBI's Phoenix field office warned of conspiracy theories inspiring violence by groups and "individual extremists," according to an October court filing for a QAnon-related criminal investigation in Colorado. Police in Parker said Cynthia Abcug was accused of conspiring with QAnon supporters to kidnap her son from foster care.

Internet-fueled conspiracies already have been linked to acts of real-world violence. A man charged with killing the reputed boss of the Gambino crime family last March showed off a QAnon symbol scrawled on his left hand during a court appearance. In 2017, a North Carolina man was sentenced to prison for firing a rifle in a Washington, D.C., pizza restaurant at the center of the debunked "Pizzagate" conspiracy theory that high-profile Democrats run a child sex trafficking ring out of the restaurant's (nonexistent) basement.

Pizzagate and other far-right conspiracy theories have faded, but experts see no end in sight to QAnon's popularity.

Nancy Rosenblum, a Harvard University professor emeritus of ethics in politics and government, said the apocalyptic nature of the QAnon narrative resonates with those who want to believe that their political enemies will be vanquished and a better future will rise from the ashes.

"What makes it unique is that Trump is the chosen one," said Rosenblum, co-author of the book "A Lot of People Are Saying: The New Conspiracism and the Assault on Democracy."

Trump Administration Ramps Up Fight Against 'Sanctuary Cities'

The Department of Justice ramped up its fight against "sanctuary" policies protecting unauthorized immigrants from deportation, with lawsuits against New Jersey and King County, Washington.

The moves follow a freeze on certain "trusted traveler" programs for New York residents which blocks them from enrolling in federal programs that help travelers speed through airport security lines and borders. The suspension is in response to NY's Green Light law that allows unauthorized immigrants to apply for driver's licenses and limits federal immigration authorities from accessing records from the state's Department of Motor Vehicles.

"Today is a significant escalation in the federal government's efforts to confront the resistance of 'sanctuary cities,'" AG William Barr told a National Sheriffs' Association conference.

The lawsuit against New Jersey asks a court to block a directive that limits cooperation by NJ law enforcement officers with federal immigration enforcement.

The lawsuit against King County, where Seattle is located, targets an executive order that restricts the use of the county airport for the deportation of immigration detainees.

Barr said his department is also reviewing the actions of certain district attorneys whom he accused of "charging foreign nationals with lesser offenses for the express purpose of avoiding the federal immigration consequences."

How moms are quietly passing gun safety policy through school boards

Ever since her daughter was shot in the leg in 1999, Donna Finkelstein has asked people whether they have a gun in their home and whether they keep it securely locked up. She viewed it as no different from checking whether their pool was gated.

"When I started becoming an activist, I realized that we're not going to win the argument of taking guns away," said Finkelstein who is a board member of Women Against Gun Violence. "To me, it was all about prevention."

Finkelstein concluded that one of the most efficient ways to teach parents about keeping their guns safely stored would be to have public schools distribute the information. Last June, the Los Angeles school board endorsed a resolution asking parents to attest that any firearms they own are safely stored.

Last Thursday, the Phoenix Union High School District became the latest to enact a policy that mirrors the Los Angeles one, and St. Louis Public Schools will vote on a similar proposal Tuesday. In addition, school districts in Southern California and Denver have launched secure gun storage awareness campaigns.

The quick spread of these policies without much resistance has largely gone unnoticed, but experts say it could be one of the most effective approaches to curb all sorts of firearm-related dangers, especially school shootings.

Over 90 percent of school shooters are students at the campuses they attack, and 80 percent get their weapons from family members, according to the Violence Project's Mass Shooter Database.

One study found that keeping firearms locked up can reduce shootings in the home by 75 percent.

However, one survey found in 2018 that about 1 in 3 people who owned guns stored them loaded and unlocked.

Under California law, parents can be criminally charged if they keep an unlocked firearm on their property where kids can get hold of it. Still, many parents are not aware they could face charges in those situations, advocates said.

To change that, the city attorney's school safety panel recommended in 2018 that the Los Angeles Unified School District send a letter to the families of all 700,000 students in the district clearly describing the secure storage law. The letter doesn't ask whether parents have a gun, but it does ask them to sign and return an acknowledgement that they've been told about the law.

There's no punishment if parents don't sign the letter, according to Todd Chamberlain, the school district's police chief; rather, it's meant to motivate them to actually read the document.

Gun groups are skeptical about the gun safety messaging spread by school districts.

"Anything they put out will be spoon fed to them by gun control fanatics who want to erase the right to keep and bear arms from the Constitution," said Dudley Brown, president of the National Association for Gun Rights.

The National Shooting Sports Foundation, which represents the firearms industry, said it was concerned about what the school districts would do with the signed copies of the letters. The group also noted that it gives away gun cable locks and has its own safe storage campaign.

Last year in Texas, the NRA and other pro-gun groups objected to a proposal for a statewide safe storage campaign, arguing that it would promote policies that "disarm citizens in a time of urgency."

"It's not a pro-gun or anti-gun conversation — it's a pro-safety conversation," said Kyleanne Hunter, a vice president of the Brady campaign. "It turns it into a risk management conversation, not what kind of rights you have." —nbcnews.com Feb.10, 2020

Loeffler backs bills to stop 'radical left' from undermining Second Amendment

Sen. Kelly Loeffler (R-GA) announced Wednesday that she had cosponsored three pro-Second Amendment bills as part of her campaign to defend Americans' right to bear arms.

S. 69, the Conceal Carry Reciprocity Act, which would enable law-abiding citizens to exercise their right to self-defense across the nation through national concealed carry reciprocity.

S. 817, the Hearing Protection Act, which would cut regulations on the purchase of hearing protection and make it easier to purchase firearm suppressors.

S. 1331, the Veterans Second Amendment Rights Restoration Act, which would protect law-abiding veterans who own firearms from having their right to bear arms unfairly infringed by the federal government without due process.

Loeffler said, "The U.S. Constitution is not option, and our Second Amendment rights are not up for debate. We must stop the radical left from trying to undermine public safety and the rights of law-abiding gun owners. We can't back down. Our right to keep and bear arms "shall not be infringed." -- breitbart.com 12 Feb. 2020

What happened at Parkland: The Stoneman Douglas High School Shooting

Two years ago, 19-year-old Nikolas Cruz, a former student at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Fla., entered the school armed with a semiautomatic AR-15 rifle and killed 17 people over a period of 5 minutes and 32 seconds.

Cruz' lawyers have made it clear that he would be willing to plead guilty to avoid the death penalty.

The Sun-Sentinel said Cruz was searched by school guards daily for weapons, and was voted "most likely to shoot up the school" by the guards.

Florida announced early this year that it will be the first state in the country to implement a statewide plan for identifying potential mass shooters before they act. Individuals planning a mass shooting often show signs of their intentions, whether in statements to friends or social media posts.

On the day of the shooting Andrew Medina, a security guard, spotted Cruz and remembered him as the "crazy boy," the Sun-Sentinel reported. Medina is being sued by Andrew Pollack, father of one of the victims, for negligence.

Cruz bumped into a freshman near a restroom while loading his rifle, police said.

The freshman alerted a staffer who was accused of not implementing the correct protocol in such an event. In total, three school employees failed to properly alert the school about a gunman on campus, the Sun-Sentinel reported.

Cruz then activated a fire alarm -- and while students were leaving their classrooms he allegedly opened fire.

Chris Hixon, the school's athletic director, tried to engage the shooter but was killed.

Aaron Feis, a football team coach, died while shielding students from the shooter.

Despite the acts of heroism, some of the public's outrage was assigned to the response by the Broward County Sheriff deputies.

Scot Peterson, a former deputy, was seen on surveillance video rushing toward the building, but then retreated and took up a position outside, where he stood with his gun drawn.

Peterson was arrested in 2019 on 11 criminal charges related to his alleged inaction during the massacre. He was charged with child neglect, culpable negligence and perjury — allegations that carry a maximum prison sentence of nearly 100 years.

Deputies Edward Eason and Josh Stambaugh were terminated following an investigation. Two other officers, Peterson and Sgt. Brian Miller were fired last year. Scott Israel, the sheriff, was removed from office by Florida Gov. Ron DeSantis.

The affidavit said. "The shooter blended in with fleeing students and was able to elude arriving officers."

Cruz was soon taken into custody without a fight.

The massacre at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School forced the country to come to terms with gun violence at schools. Some students at the school, like David Hogg, became political activists and challenged the status quo on gun laws.

Former President Obama wrote a column for Time magazine and called the students inspirations for change.

"Seared by memories of seeing their friends murdered at a place they believed to be safe, these young leaders don't intimidate easily," he wrote.

Parents of some of the victims at the school have also pressed for accountability ranging from stricter gun laws, more effective police responses and schools designed with safe spaces for students in the event of a shooting. The Sun-Sentinel report said some students in the school were trapped in a hallway because the restrooms were locked due to a vaping trend on campus.

Media persist in calling deadly hatred of Jews "anti-Semitism" — falsely smearing a billion Arab Semites

With so much hatred of Jews in the world -- constantly on front pages -- even the blind can see it is critical for Jews to prepare themselves for self defense. Denying this is a formula for death. A government that seeks to disarm its population is openly advocating a lethal policy toward this vulnerable group of people. It is a holocaust being prepared by policy and must not be tolerated.

Jewish denigrators must be called out for what they are, not hidden with a white-washed bland euphemism like anti-Semites, which they are not. These Jew-hating politicians, reporters and citizens must face the cold steel backing up Never Again!, in the hands of well-trained Jews and all Americans who stand, as even leftists insist, against bias, bigotry, prejudice and hatred in all its forms. Efforts to disarm or subarm any segment of the population must be flatly rejected if for no other reason than these measures disarm Jews who are constantly under armed assault.

It is time for our schools to teach armed self defense, and the value of an armed republic to resist tyranny, hatred and abuse. Domestic violence must be met with countervailing force. Criminal attack must be met with armed might. The same types of firearms and ammunition Officer Friendly deems appropriate for dealing with street crime, jihadis, civil unrest, drug gangs and the rest are the types we the people need and should be comfortable with owning and operating. Training is thus crucial. The evil scourges of communistic and socialistic tyrannies need to face armed resistance wherever they raise their dictatorial heads, as Americans understood a mere few decades ago. No more coddling and excuses that allows these pernicious diseases to flourish. Freedom requires defense. Real defense. Get armed. Get trained. Be prepared. Billionaires could leave earth behind for space colony as 'climate collapses'

Coronavirus, climate change, overpopulation, rising sea levels, and the ever-present threat of nuclear war. Lots of people would leave this planet if they possibly could.

And maybe a few people can.

A number of multi-billionaires – Elon Musk, Jeff Bezos, Richard Branson and Yuri Milner – have poured huge chunks of their fortunes into space travel.

Some people are speculating that the mega-rich might be planning to flee off-planet.

In a New York Times article entitled The Rich Are Planning to Leave This Wretched Planet, Michael Suffredini, who is spearheading the creation of a new "luxury" space station called Axiom, revealed the details of his designer orbital habitat.

He predicted that a holiday on Axiom would cost $55million.

He said that three people had already signed up. The station is slated to receive its first guests in 2022.

Elon Musk has made no secret of his plan to establish a permanent settlement on Mars. He has stressed the importance of ensuring that humanity is a multi-planet species so that some of us will be left if the worst should happen.

Noted American media theorist Douglas Rushkoff has written that the overall direction of technological development was about creating an escape route for the super-rich.

He pointed out that combat robots would serve very well to guard the bolt-holes of billionaires remaining on Earth once climate change reached its end-game and described Elon Musk's planned Mars colony as "less a continuation of the human diaspora than a lifeboat for the elite." --

The Ahuman Manifesto

A Cambridge academic has proposed a radical new way to solve climate change – letting humanity become extinct.

Patricia MacCormack, a professor of continental philosophy at Anglia Ruskin University, has just released her new book The Ahuman Manifesto, which will be launched in Cambridge today.

The book argues that due to the damage done to other living creatures on Earth, we should start gradually phasing out reproduction. It has generated discussion due to its joyful and optimistic tone, as it sets out a positive view for the future of Earth – without mankind.

It also touches on several hot-button topics, from religion and veganism to identity politics, tying these into how the creation of a hierarchal world among humans has left us blind to the destruction we are causing to our habitat and other forms of life.

Speaking to CambridgeshireLive, Professor MacCormack outlined how she came to this point of view, and how these ideas are not as provocative as they may initially sound.

She said: "I arrived at this idea from a couple of directions. I was introduced to philosophy due to my interest in feminism and queer theory, so reproductive rights have long been an interest to me – this led me to learn more about animal rights, which is when I became vegan.

"The basic premise of the book is that we're in the age of the Anthropocene, humanity has caused mass problems and one of them is creating this hierarchal world where white, male, heterosexual and able-bodied people are succeeding, and people of different races, genders, sexualities and those with disabilities are struggling to get that.

"The book also argues that we need to dismantle religion, and other overriding powers like the church of capitalism or the cult of self, as it makes people act upon enforced rules rather than respond thoughtfully to the situations in front of them."

The central argument in The Ahuman Manifesto can be boiled down to this: mankind is already enslaved to the point of "zombiedom" by capitalism, and because of the damage this has caused, phasing out reproduction is the only way to repair the damage done to the world.

This argument has not received as much disagreement as you might expect.

Professor MacCormack continued: "Everyone's okay with the ideas in the book until they're told they'd have to act on it. There is a lot of agreement that these changes might work for the world, but when it imposes on people, it becomes proactive."

FBI FISA warrants 'not valid'

The FISC [Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court] has ruled that at least two of the spy warrants used by the FBI against Carter Page were not lawful.

FISA judge James Boasberg said the DOJ is still assessing whether two other FISA warrants on Carter Page were also obtained illegally by the FBI.

The June 2017 FISA warrant was signed by former DAG Rod Rosenstein and Former Deputy Director of the FBI Andrew McCabe.

Did Robert Mueller actually use information gathered in real time by the illegal wiretaps on Carter Page?

If so, this could pose a huge problem for Mueller's cases against Trump officials because the wiretaps are now officially invalid.
